The Global Financial Crisis exposed a number of flaws in the regulation of capital adequacy and in bank capital adequacy. It has prompted a number of proposed changes in the Basel II capital requirements, including support for the introduction of a minimum leverage ratio in addition to the risk-weighted requirement. Proposals for "contingent capital" requirements have also been made by a number of prominent commentators. This session will review recent developments in bank capital adequacy and examine the various proposals for change and likely implications.

Prof Kevin Davis will deliver a paper followed by discussion with industry experts.

Who should attend:

Bank prudential and capital managers, Regulatory affairs managers, Financial Regulators, Senior lenders and credit policy-makers, Finance academics, Corporate borrowers.
